Abraham Lincoln

Lincoln gave the final speech of the convention, in which he endorsed the party platform and called for the preservation of the Union. In a larger sense, the outpouring of grief and anguish was in response to the deaths of so many men in the war that had just ended. In early March 1830, partly out of fear of a milk sickness outbreak along the Ohio River, several members of the extended Lincoln family moved west to Illinois, a non-slaveholding state, and settled in Macon County, 10 miles 16 km west of Decatur.

His stepmother provided the teenage Abraham with more affection and guidance than his natural mother or his father ever did. As a corollary of the proclamation, the Lincoln administration began recruiting black soldiers and sailors, mostly freed slaves—189,000 in all by the end of the war. During the same session Lincoln and one colleague from Sangamon County entered a protest against a resolution passed overwhelmingly by the legislature that denounced antislavery societies in such a way as to imply approval of slavery.

The Sixteenth US President

Meade checked this movement with a clash at Bristoe Station and eventually pushed southward again. Two other independent parties formed but failed to carry a single state in the fall elections. Or it may have been a partisan maneuver—Lincoln was a Whig, Polk a Democrat—to ingratiate himself with the older Whigs in Washington.
