Unmarried women received the right to vote in the.

Middlesex by Jeffrey Eugenides

Each character was painted with broad strokes that created no space for this reader to wonder or develop compassion.

Orphan Train by Christina Baker Kline

Also, the author's attempts to write in Molly's teenage voice frequently came across as awkward - they are written pretty matter-of-factly and then all of a sudden there is random swearing or a makeout scene or her political differences with her stepmom.

The Lacemaker by Laura Frantz

American edition: Jephta and his daughter.

When Fay finally emerges from her room, she screams and wails and throws herself on Judge's body before being dragged away.

Laurel's Lists

Besides their own festival of , they participated directly in the rites of , and. Weston reviews Welty's work in terms of the gothic tradition to show how she uses gothic themes and narrative techniques within the southern literary framework. Her calculated decisions are borne of a book's slowly mounting tension and realized with fabulous aplomb.
