Joanna Margaret Paul's Poetry, Reconsidered by...

Unwrapping is operating within the same set of events, but has abandoned the biographical narrative, and the revised narrative it builds in its place is partly etymological, creating a growing body of linkages between the human body and the domesticated world. If we take a large leap back nearly twenty years, from one review to another, to the period just after Imogen's birth, and before her death, we see how unchanging Paul's attitude has been: the inanimate objects which are her preferred subjects share an invisible but real human presence transferred through ownership and association with family events for example the Thank you for Imogen still-lives, marking the birth of her second child.

It might be argued that this was a failure to contain emotion, for those who regard it as antithetical to art, but that was never the aim.

It does however give the book a sense of order which contrasts a trifle unhappily with the overall tone of desperation, a virtual demand that we share her grief for her dead child. Though I only know this through personal correspondence.

Parting Closure: Imogen and Unwrapping the Body. When she was about 14, she got in an argument with her mother, and Priscilla spanked her in the back of a car.

The Combat

There is also, just perhaps, a submerged reference to the possibility of an abortion, an option which would have been open to any mother carrying a child with a congenital defect.

They later did a spanking scene on the show, My Little Margie. The exhibition occasioned an eponymous catalogue by Ramp Press and also travelled to The Physics Room Contemporary Art Space, Christchurch.

The Combat

Morandi's nature morte seem at first glance, literally morte: motionless and lifeless. This is a source of hope which is not only artistic, but philosophical as well. In an interview for TVNZ's Kaleidoscope arts magazine programme in 1982, while the resident Frances Hodgkins Fellow in Dunedin, Paul claimed that, while an avid reader, poetry-making began after having already been painting for some time.

Joanna Margaret Paul's Barrys Bay: Interior With Bed And Doll

Many of this spread's terms can be related to the notion of generation or conception, from properly animal reproductive terms such as gonad, spermatagonum, and embryo, to their counterparts in the vegetative world: kernel, seed twice, sprout twice, acorn and pine cone. Painting for me as a woman is an ordinary act — about the great meaning in ordinary things. It is the stasis of death.
