Urban Scale Richmond: RESUSCITATING URBAN FORMS AT HISTORIC NAUVOO, ILLINOIS

During a large portion of the Gothic period it was usual to add to each tower a lofty pyramidal roof or spire, and these are still standing in some instances, though many of them have disappeared. The carpets were located side by side in the shrine. They all pressed on from similar starting-points to similar goals; and if the French went ahead in one direction, they fell astern in another.

In addition, the discovery of the ruins of Pompeii fed the fires of a new fashion in the arts, called Neoclassicism. The rooms laid out to the south of the corridor were the dining room and school room, with the butler's pantry and housekeeper's room to the north. The front was designed to receive two open tracery spires, but only one of them has been erected.

But the general usage after this period was to include the towers in the composition of the façade; their actual functions as belfries became apparent only above the level of the vaults. By this time, portraits favored more relaxed and intimate settings, and the sitter was portrayed naturally... more so than in previous generations. This latter view can be seen, in varying forms, in the writings of Le Corbusier, Jane Jacobs and Oscar Newman, to name a few.
