And though some died because of the seizure of their land or diseases caught from new settlers, between 9,000 and 16,000 were murdered in cold blood—the victims of a policy of genocide sponsored by the state of California and gleefully assisted by its newest citizens.

Contemporaneous illustration of Sutter's Fort A, Sutter threatened to raise the French flag over California and place New Helvetia under French protection, but in 1846 California was occupied by the United States in the.

Der Kaiser von Kalifornien (1936)

Sutter was a quintessential outsider driven by anxiety over status—a man of talent, vision, and heroic ambitions who nevertheless became the victim of his own inadequacies as a businessman and his inability to adjust to a rapidly changing frontier.

Who Really Struck It Rich During the California Gold Rush?

This small piece of yellow metal is believed to be the first piece of gold discovered in 1848 at Sutter's Mill in California, launching the gold rush.

The city of San Francisco, with little more than a few hundred settlers in 1848, boomed to a population of over 25,000 by 1850.

Who Really Struck It Rich During the California Gold Rush?

The two tried to keep it a secret, but word got out and men flocked to the foothills in search of their fortune. For the state and federal government, it was imperative both to make room for new settlers and to lay claim to gold on traditional tribal lands.
