He is a sort of horseman of the Apocalypse on a pale grey horse. McGerr uses the Chanson de Roland as an example of a narrative text that is technically complete and yet lacks true closure.

Chrétien de Troyes

Nocturnal exhumations represent the transgression of social contracts which ensure the protection and peace of the cemetery. A stripe "greener than a grape leaf" runs down the center of the new gift horse's head, separating the two sides, which are white and black. With this more flexible model, it becomes possible to account for varying degrees of fantastic elements within a text, because it becomes possible to identify varying degrees of supernaturalness in those elements.
