Self-categorisation, commitment to the group and group self-esteem as related but distinct aspects of social identity, European Journal of Social Psychology

BIRGing basking in reflected glory is when a person uses the association of another person's success to boost his or her self-esteem or self-glory. In fact, it is possible that the social prestige conferred by an educational degree is a more important determinant of life expectancy than the skills acquired with each year of education see Figure 2.
