Though the tribe remained peaceful, the display earned the attention of the government, which gave the tribe 12. She herself was on the run from life as a social outcast in the East, her young son in tow. Some saw Catlin as exploiting the people he painted, particularly as he drove himself nearly to ruin by trying to sell their images.

1800s

In a way he sacrificed his whole life including his savings and family for this pursuit. Based on first hand studies made in the field by Catlin, these prints provide us with some of the most authentic images of Plains Indians from the mid-nineteenth century.
