RICHARD HUGHES AND THE BARITSU CHAPTER Recently I had occasion, for the Friends of the Sherlock Holmes Collections' newsletter's editor, Julie McKuras BSI, and for her contributor to an issue, Mitch Higurashi BSI, to pull out the item below that I'd done originally as my 1996 paper for The Five Orange Pips, and later had turned into the “Third Scionic Interpolation” in Irregular Crises of the Late 'Forties, in ch. 7, it being a remarkable sidelight on BSI history. I met Richard Hughes only once, when he came to Washington D.C. in the late 1970s on a book tour. He was an Australian who'd become virtually the dean of the foreign correspondent corps in East Asia, based in Hong Kong and before that in Tokyo. I had originally gotten in touch with him when I saw an essay of his in 1974, in the Far Eastern Economic Review, entitled “Confucius, Lin Piao — and Sherlock Holmes,” in order to reprint it in Baker Street Miscellanea. He readily gave permission for that, and in the correspondence that followed, made me a member of The Baritsu Chapter, the BSI scion society (really a society of its own) that he had co

It was about as huge an international scoop as possible to imagine in the mid-1950s.

Richard J. Hughes

Although Hughes expected to be posted in France and perhaps to die on the battlefield during World War I, an abrupt and welcome armistice saved the young man from such a fate. The episode starts with him telling the story of, an Veteran of the South Pacific during being falsely accused by a bus driver of being drunk and disorderly, who then has a policeman remove the man from the bus. Relationship and Published Poetry A Fulbright Fellowship brought Plath to Cambridge University in England.
