amulettes puniques

The ingredients used for making dyes were largely organic and would not have survived and one would expect to find large vats or tubs and water channels in which the materials would have been treated.

Similar explanations have been used to understand the presence of other objects in burials. Once the cloth has been immersed in the solution, it undergoes an oxidation process through its exposure to air. Once done, the women simply throw the still living, if perhaps irritated snails back into the sea.

Carthage

Yet the processes described constitute a very small production of the dye, suitable for personal use. In ancient Egypt, sea shells and their imitations, which were made out of semi-precious and even precious stone and metal, were worn by the living to protect them from harm.

Meanwhile we are still busy entering the books of the erudite Prof.

Sites archéologiques en Tunisie: Le site archeologique Utique

In ancient Mesopotamia, sea shells were used for foundation deposits and some, which were used as cosmetic containers, were placed in burials as offerings.
