Invited Article: Spectral focusing with asymmetric pulses for high-contrast pump—probe stimulated Raman scattering microscopy. The oscillating electric field component of electromagnetic radiation may bring about an induced dipole in a molecule which follows the alternating electric field which is modulated by the molecular vibrations.

Although physically-based watershed models have been widely used to estimate nutrient emissions, connections between nutrient abatement and compliance of water quality standards have been rarely considered in NPS hotspot ranking, which may lead to ineffective decision-making. Stimulated Raman Scattering Microscopy for Brain Imaging: Basic Principle, Measurements, and Applications.

It is estimated to be completed in July 2017. At high pumping levels in long fibers, higher-order Raman spectra can be generated by using the Raman spectrum as a new starting point, thereby building a chain of new spectra with decreasing amplitude. Analytical Chemistry 2020, 92 1 ,
