Democracy's accountability problem

There is another type of accountability to conscience. It is his duty to discharge his functions with utmost sincerity and efficiency.

Democracy and Public Accountability — PakVoter

It is a very well-known fact that the ministers in a democracy are temporary executives. Public service providers too, such as the National Health Service and the Metropolitan Police, suffer little more oversight than retrospective rhetoric.

Promoting Accountability & Transparency

The strength of democracy lies not so much in common people holding power and ruling over themselves, but more about the belief and trust in the idealistic notions of democracy, society, rule of law, and the decisions made by a subset of people the elected group must be followed by all. The New Public Management offers the following ideas: ADVERTISEMENTS: 1.

But the government did not fire any scientific advisors. Unofficially, our publicly-funded but unaccountable governors are known as QANGOs quasi non-government organisations. For some misdemeanour or wrongdoing they may be removed from service.

A case of political accountability

This is not only a common sense affair but the very foundation of democracy. A bureaucrat must always remember that he is performing his duties with utmost sincerity, efficiency, and responsibility.

A case of political accountability

At the moment, those who want to find out how public bodies are performing must piece together information from different documents, often with no explanation of the rationale for an initial target or why those targets have subsequently changed. The ministers are doubly accountable.

Immediately after assuming charges Clinton declared a policy of public administration.

A case of political accountability

The significance of right to information laws with regard to public accountability can be gauged from the fact that over 100 countries have enacted such laws. In parliamentary systems, the government relies on the support, which gives parliament the power to hold the government accountable.
