This, coming at the very end of the poem, almost sums up the poem as one with a deep, underlying note of romantic yearning, one that never sees its fulfillment. I am your guardian, in the place of mother, And I will turn you naked from these doors If you but dare-- CLARICE.

William Gilmore Simms, 1806

But a few moments, And I have spoken all that my full heart Might not contain with safety. All footnotes are moved to the end of line groups in which the reference occurs.

Louis, that great western city, Our worthy cousin, Norman, has grown famous! Art sure of what you tell me? These moneys, Procured by him upon this document, Were all by him consumed. That a mere dream, The blar and frightful aspects of a vision, Should rouse me to such terror,-- shake my soul From the strong moorings of a steadfast will, And drive it, a mere wreck, upon the seas, No hand upon the helm! I doubt not;-- And yet, dear Clarice, if indeed you love me, The single moment that this woman gives us, Becomes a life;--to me, of happiness,-- To thee, as full of happiness as thou Might hope to gain from me. I'll let her know from whose benevolent hand She eats the bread of charity--whose mercy It is, that clothes her nakedness with warmth.
