History of the (Grand) National Roadster Show

The November meeting features the Old Roan Chase and the December meeting sees two races run over the national fences the Becher Chase and Grand Sefton Chase. The most gruelling race For the Grand National In living memory, the time more than 32 seconds above the slowest previous one For the race since the war, Quare Times' in '55; on the two other occasions in the last twenty years when heavy ground has prevailed it was soft in Little Polveir's year in our view rather than the official heavy there have been very few finishers, four out of thirty in Ben Nevis' year and six out of thirty-six in Miinneoma's, and only six got round this time, one of those remounted to do so; there were three fatalities, all before Becher's first time, so it's hard to blame the conditions for that regrettably high figure; in terms of quality the race was also perceived as somewhat lacking though there were this season's Hennessy and Welsh National winners as well as the runners-up in the King George and Irish Hennessy and the '96 National winner Rough Quest; as usual the better runners came to the fore, the only two in the handicap of which there were just seven to get round finishing a distance clear of anything else; all those to complete deserve praise and creditable mentions should also go to Greenhil Tare Away and Ciel de Brion, who were prominent for so long and still in contention when departing in the closing stages, and Brave Highlander, who was going as well as any when unseating at the second Canal Turn. In addition to the domestic audience of 10 million, it is watched by an estimated worldwide audience of 500 million.

Grand National farce: 20 years on from the race that never was

Today Aintree is owned and managed by Jockey Club Racecourses, one of 15 operated by The Jockey Club subsidiary. The course was secured by police who evacuated jockeys, race personnel, and local residents along with 60,000 spectators. Sir Lindsay finished third in 1930 and Thomond II occupied the same position in 1934 and 1935.

This means that race officials assign more weight to horses who are deemed to be top competitors. Another famous tradition of the race is the way that certain fences on the Aintree track have gained wide renown.

The Grand National Horse Race

McCoy Finally ending his drought In this great race, an achievement that rather mirrored Sir Gordon Richards' much-celebrated win on Pinza in the 1953 Derby towards the end of his riding career; the race itself was a terrific spectacle, too, with pacesetters Conna Castle and Black Apalachi ensuring it was run at a much stronger gallop than for the last 2 renewals fastest time since 1996 ; as is often the case with well-run races over these fences, it paid to race handily and previous course experience proved an asset, too, as jumping ability was tested to the full Don't Push It may have been tackling these fences for the first time, but 9 of the 13 other finishers had all completed the course at least once previously. This time there would be no replacement — be it directly or in spirit — as all efforts were put into defending home soil from the Germans.
