Bavaria

Ludwig II was King of Bavaria from 1864 until his death in 1886, and no other prediction could have been both more accurate or so mysteriously fascinating. Ludwig started hating Munich to such a degree that he even decided to move the capital of Bavaria in Nurnberg.

Easily frightened by physical ugliness, Ludwig always turned his eyes away when he saw an unattractive person. It is today the top attraction in the palace and is in fact seven meters longer than the one in Versailles. Prevented by foreign and domestic political constraints from putting his idealized vision of his role as king into practice, with Neuschwanstein Castle and the palaces of Linderhof and Herrenchiemsee in their unspoilt natural settings the monarch created artificial alternative worlds in which he could immerse himself in far-distant places and past eras.

The rugs, she said, were the kind that graced her far-away palace; the silks were the same ones worn in her castle of darkness; and even better linens than what she had showed me draped the altarpieces of her abode in the nether world.

Bavaria's 'Mad King' Ludwig may not have been so mad after all

His marriage to his cousin Sophie was cancelled in 1867 and Ludwig spent more time with young officers and actors. His name became immortal due to the impressive castles he built during his short lifetime.

He was music director of the theater in Magdeburg from 1834 to 1836, where his next work, Das Liebesverbot Forbidden Love, loosely based on William Shakespeare's 1564—1616 Measure for Measure was performed in 1836. Because they were turned into museums at an early stage, the three buildings have been preserved almost in their entirety. Neuschwanstein under construction: upper courtyard photograph c.
