Ion attempts to resist this by claiming that thanks to his study of Homer, he knows what a general for example should say 540d5. That is a problem about which the philosopher above all worries about. Many rhetoricians have artfully and effectively misled their audiences, and Socrates argues—somewhat implausibly perhaps—that in order to mislead one cannot oneself be misled.

As in so many other cases, he sets the agenda for the subsequent tradition. A slightly closer look reveals that any such simple characterization is misleading, because the first half is also about rhetoric, in several different ways. Socrates posits that there are Forms or Ideas of beds and tables, the maker of which is a god; there are imitations thereof, namely beds and tables, produced by craftsmen such as carpenters who behold the Forms as though they were looking at blueprints; thirdly, there are imitators of the products of the craftsmen, who, like painters, create a kind of image of these objects in the world of becoming.
