Internalist vs. Externalist Conceptions of Epistemic Justification (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

Attempts to answer the Gettier problem generated the I-E debate. Hence, access internalism is implausible and should be rejected, because neither its weak nor its strong form is acceptable. Externalists tend to think internalism lands in skepticism but that we have good reason to suspect skepticism is false.

The roots of this anti-Cartesianism are not only broad but deep, predating Heidegger, and indeed the twentieth century. From this suitably abstract computational perspective, it is argued, there does not seem to be a huge amount of difference between internal processes performed by the brain on information-bearing structures

Internalism and Externalism in Semantics and Epistemology by Sanford C. Goldberg

The externalist's assessment of justification can be contrasted with access internalism, which demands that the believer have internal reflective access to reasons or facts which corroborate their belief in order to be justified in holding it. When a belief stands in this natural relation to the true state of affairs believed then the belief is an instance of noninferential knowledge. Content internalism henceforth internalism is the position that our contents depend only on properties of our bodies, such as our brains.

Internalist vs. Externalist Conceptions of Epistemic Justification (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

As a rough, initial approximation, extended mind is the view that not all mental states or acts are exclusively located inside the person who believes, desires, hopes, fears, and so on. When we conceive things in the same way for example, as twins across worlds do, we have the same contents.
