Individuals provide much of the reason for, and some of the limits to, the security-seeking activities of the state. Since the state has to be viewed either as the source of all value, or, at a minimum, as the necessary condition for the realization of any value, the preservation of the state, and the consequent pursuit of state interest, supersede the individual values from which they notionally derive.

People, states and fear : an agenda for international security studies in the post-cold war era 31. As locks, alarms and bars proliferate, their daily presence amplifies the magnitude of the threat by advertising to burglars the presence of valuable possessions, thereby leading to a net loss of tranquillity for the fortified householders.

Lynne Rienner Publishers

Are subject- ive and objective aspects of security separable in any meaningful way? In combination, these add up to an analytical framework which stands comparison with anything available from the more established concepts.

Here the argument is that the state acquires independent standing above its citizens because of the essential role it plays in the realization of individual interests. Unacceptable chaos becomes the motive for sacrificing some freedom in order to improve levels of security, and in this process, government and the state are born.
