Stranded: the Forgotten Assyrians of Al

The One who passes over and absolves any fault. George, and a community hall in al-Qaryah. Whilst these communities were smaller, did not have their own churches, and were not served by their own local priests, there was a plan to build a modest Syriac Orthodox church.

In 1973 the fast-growing town was renamed al-Thawrah, in memory of the March 8th coup d'état which, in 1963, brought the Ba'ath Party to power in Syria. Around the year 2000, a plot of land in the Third Quarter was purchased by them in order to build a new church, closer to where the bulk of the community lived, and in the same neighbourhood as the local Antiochian Orthodox Church.

Owing to their low salaries, however, and a lack of employment in other industries in the city, many of these families were unable to develop themselves economically. The first Assyrians to settle in al-Thawrah were dam and construction workers, as well as civil, electrical and mechanical engineers. Up until the 1960s it was an insignificant village on the Euphrates River named al-Tabqah.
