L'Assommoir by Émile Zola

Madame Boche had led Claude and Etienne away, and one could hear at the other end of the building the sound of their sobs, mingled with the sonorous shocks of the two beetles. When he entered, she thought he was ill; he looked so pale, his eyes were so red, and the veins on his face were all swollen.

L'Assommoir Study Guide: Analysis

More My buddies and I needed some drinks and a respite from the afternoon's freezing rain, so in we went. Several years will pass - and this topic will receive a deep, innovative embodiment in the novel Germina I. Clemence said how one day she had swallowed three bunches of cress for lunch.
