A selection of the correspondence of Linnaeus and other naturalists; from the original manuscripts. By Sir James Edward Smith.

At Uppsala, he restored the University's botanical garden arranging the plants according to his system of classification, made three more expeditions to various parts of Sweden, and inspired a generation of students. Because of difficulties in recognising all the material interpolated by Smith it has been maintained as a single historic collection. In 1734 he mounted another expedition to central Sweden.

As he wrote in the preface to a late edition of Systema Naturae: Creationis telluris est gloria Dei ex opere Naturae per Hominem solum-- The Earth's creation is the glory of God, as seen from the works of Nature by Man alone. In his attempts to grow foreign plants in Sweden, Linnaeus also theorized that plant species might be altered through the process of acclimatization. Other Linnaean specimens are kept at the University of Uppsala's.

Linnaeus drew some rather astonishing parallels between plant sexuality and human love: he wrote in 1729 how 'The flowers' leaves. The letters are an invaluable source of information for interpreting other parts of the collections.

Zoological and most botanical taxonomic priority begin with Linnaeus: the oldest plant names accepted as valid today are those published in Species Plantarum, in 1753, while the oldest animal names are those in the tenth edition of Systema Naturae 1758, the first edition to use the binomial system consistently throughout.
