Education in the Arab World: Measuring Up Or “Upping” Our Measures?

Some schools in several Arab states offer quality education of international caliber, including Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, and the United Arab Emirates. Core curricular issues, such as the teaching of religion or language of instruction for minorities, have not been solved, reflecting governmental inability to address vital sociopolitical issues involved in education. Recent studies by several international and Arab organizations point out that Arab children are at risk despite the decrease in dropout and illiteracy rates and the easier access to basic education.

Financial education in the Arab World: Strategies, Implementation and Impact

. Disinterest in professionalization of educators, however, combined with efforts to subordinate them to central control, suggests that regimes do not want to empower stakeholders.

Education in the Arab World: Measuring Up Or “Upping” Our Measures?

Arab political economies have not generated class-based pressure on government to improve educational policy. Syria Dimashq University One of the top universities in Syria is Damascus University, which has produced many talented people who have changed the lives of others. Even today, around 99 percent of both Iraqi and Syrian male and female youth are literate.

The Importance of Education and Careers in the Arab World

Educational policy reforms, especially those supported by bilateral and multilateral aid agencies, typically focus on top-down technical solutions that overlook obstacles posed by national political economies. As long as the student proves to show outstanding academic performance there are organizations to fund their educational needs.

Education In the Arab World and How They Differ

The emergence of a global learning crisis and waning international support for education lead us to call for a new Global Compact on Learning that provides a broad framework and a series of targeted actions to improve learning opportunities and outcomes for all children and youth, especially the most marginalized.
