Effective Problem Solving and Decision Making

. When we recognize that managers often need to make decisions under challenging circumstances with time pressures, constraints, a great deal of uncertainty, highly visible and high-stakes outcomes, and within changing conditions, it makes sense that they would not have the time to formally work through all the steps of the rational decision-making model. In other words, they were twice as good at figuring out which concepts deserved more attention.

Decision Making

They can choose an alternative with highest expected outcome.
