Our sense of smell loses its refinement in a hothouse, but we walk, talk, play games better by practicing.

Œuvres philosophiques de Maine de Biran,

A perceptive, memorable account of his thought occurs in French Philosophies of the Romantic Period, by George Boas Baltimore: Press, 1925. He won membership in the institute in 1805 by gaining another first prize, for M émoire sur la d écomposition de la penser The Analysis of Thought. Despite these public activities, he was at the time of his death acknowledged by most of his distinguished contemporaries as their master ma ître à tous in philosophy.

Maine de Biran

To escape the , he retired to his estate in 1793 and began intensive psychological and philosophical investigations. Maine de Biran responded to these objections by using his basic distinction between impressions and the effort voulu, or between images, or copies of outward impressions, and our idea of inward felt effort. .
