English embroidery: the forgotten wonder of the medieval world

Crusaders returned to Europe with rich eastern fabrics which gave embroiderers solid gold grounds on which to work. This involved laying a metal thread on the surface and attaching threads of gold, silver and silk with a linen thread at regular intervals from underneath, therefore providing a surface on the ground fabric which would catch the light and give a sense of flow and texture. The stable society that existed between the accession of Elizabeth in 1558 and the encouraged the building and furnishing of new houses, in which rich textiles played a part.
