Problems and Process: International Law and How We Use It, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1994. Conventional relief practice gets a late start on famines because it focuses on the final stage of widespread deaths, rather than intervening earlier in the famine process. Problems and Process is a revised version of a series of 15 lectures delivered in the form of a prestigious course general at the Hague Academy of International Law.

In Higgins's view, international law is shaped by what those in power decide, and it is primarily to help them decide more intelligently and constructively that international law serves human wellbeing. Eloquent and well-organized, the chapter is a recommended reading for students and professors in international law on all academic levels, as well as for those interested in international development and international affairs. She looks at the rights and obligations of the old colonial states.

With this statement Higgins reveals that human rights are inexorably interlinked with policy-making and political factors. The second regime change occurs in June 1966 and reflects the increasing issue polarization over Vietnam in the Johnson administration. She maintains a balance between being controversial and critical, on the one hand, and being a pioneering problem-solver, on the other hand.
