Pardesi (1957)

The narrative of Rabban Sauma and Markos' travels to the West via the southern route around the Taklamakan Desert is thin until they reached Ilkhanid Persia and Iraq. It may seem ironic, given the traditional perception of the Ottoman Turks as somehow having narrower intellectual horizons than their European counterparts in the 16 th century, but in fact, as Giancarlo Casale has recently shown, the Turks re-discovered the Arab geographers before Europe did and also acquired good information about parts of East Asia. The best-known accounts from the 13 th century are those of the Franciscans John of Plano Carpini, who undertook a Papal mission to the court of the Great Khan in Mongolia in the 1240s, William of Rubruck, who arrived in Mongolia via a different route a decade later, and the Venetian merchant's son, Marco Polo, who spent nearly two decades in the service of Khubilai Khan in China.
