Building a HighScope Program: Family Child Care Programs — Early Years

Many programs use their data and the expected PFCE outcomes to design their PFCE program goals. When collecting and using data, it is helpful to consider from the outset what you want to achieve with families and children and which outcomes are most important to work toward over the projected five-year period.

In Topic 4, four scenarios offer samples of program goals and measurable objectives and show how each connects to a program's action plan. The scenarios also include sample data, tools, and methods for tracking progress. Parent input on program plans can be sought through Policy Council and parent committee meetings, parent focus groups, staff and parent conversations, parent representation on the Health Services Advisory Committee, and on planning committees.

The HSPPS require programs to include parents and family members when setting school readiness goals. Just as the domains in the ELOF are made more specific through the development of school readiness goals, PFCE outcomes can also be tailored to support the strengths and needs of unique populations. And despite these challenges, to their credit, providers still seek ways to grow and develop their craft.
