

Children Act 1975

Butterworth - Education for All Handicapped Children Act

Executive Summary

Autistic spectrum disorders are present from birth or very early in development and affect essential human functions such as social interaction, the ability to communicate (often with language impairment), and the ability to understand and respond to the environment. Although precise scientific criteria for diagnosis have not yet been established, it is clear that autistic spectrum disorders are a group of developmental disabilities that affect social interaction and communication. They generally have lifelong effects on how children learn to be social beings, to take care of themselves, and to participate in the community. The autistic spectrum occurs along with varying degrees of intellectual disability or giftedness. These children's learning needs differ from those of other typical children and require specialized and often associated with accompanying disabilities.

According to the original text of the Education of All Handicapped Children Act of 1975, the original intent of the act was to ensure that all children with disabilities have the right to a free appropriate public education. The act also states that the act is intended to ensure that all children with disabilities have the right to a free appropriate public education. The act also states that the act is intended to ensure that all children with disabilities have the right to a free appropriate public education.
