In contrast, because they did not commercialize their own drug products, the fine chemical manufacturers tended to lack any significant marketing organization. Drug dealers, for instance, cannot go to the police if they are robbed, cheated, or attacked, and so they tend to band together to defend themselves and their market — and they aren't as patient as your average abuela. During the mid-1990s, for example, executives at Parke-Davis, a Warner-Lambert subsidiary at the time, allegedly marketed an epilepsy drug called Neurontin for such unapproved uses as migraines, social phobia, and manic-depressive disorder.

Physicians already have that freedom, and use it all the time, particularly in specialties like psychiatry where the boundaries between different disorders are blurry in the first place. But are the industry's lobbying efforts always good for business? Pick from Mount Sinai Hospital in New York City visited the institute's laboratories twice a week, spending an average of five hours at the institute during each visit.

They found the median time to develop a new drug was 7 years. For example, the FDA twice warned Bayer that it was improperly promoting the antibiotic Avelox for unapproved uses -- although Bayer has denied doing so.
