Panic of 1893

Compromise in the name of stability, however, also meant surrender on the issue of Black voting rights and equality, cementing injustice into the postbellum foundation of the country. In essence, the Red Shirts were a South Carolinian version of the Ku Klux Klan KKK, which operated in several other states. Even if the troop presence had continued beyond 1877, to preserve the gains of Reconstruction, Congress would have had to greatly expand the size of the Army—an option no one was considering—and have troops deploy far more extensively and use force more aggressively.

Third, failed efforts to install democracy and rebuild governments can leave those who do the most to make things better the most vulnerable. The white supremacist groups billed themselves as forces of law and order, punishing theft and supposedly defending white women. Similarly, in Mississippi, white supremacists prevented Black citizens from voting; an exception was the town of Grand Gulf, where Black residents came to the polls carrying arms.

Panic of 1893

The Panic of 1893 has been traced to many causes. In addition, the government would be less able to provide services and win over the population. Army in large numbers, and many were eager to join state militias or otherwise serve.
