Among the projects that received colonial development and welfare funds in the 1930s and 1940s, the Gold Coast Broadcasting Service, the East African Literature Bureau, and the Colonial Film Unit are but a few examples that demonstrate how British cultural forms were increasingly incorporated into development aims. The council recruited former colonial administrators to join its new empire division and investigate the type of work the council should pursue in the colonies. In August 1948, the Colonial Office issued a definition document between itself and the council that aimed to demarcate the separate categories of culture and development.
