As noted in section 1, the materialist approach views language as an evolutionary product rather than a sudden, species-specific mutation, and many of the principles of the materialist position have been developed in working out the empirical foundations for a theory of language change Weinreich, Labov and Herzog 1968. The idealist position is that the data of linguistics consists of speakers' opinions about how they should speak: judgments of grammaticality or acceptability that they make about sentences that are presented to them.

Some Observations on the Foundation of Linguistics

The material should integrate more than one authoritative source of information and include references. These ³emic² categories phoneme, morpheme, syntagme are the fundamental currency of linguistic theory. The two approaches, idealist and materialist, differ sharply in their approaches to the foundations of the field: definition of language itself, the methods for gathering data and analyzing it, and the goals of linguistic activity.

. Because we devote a good deal of space to methodological issues and to discussion of the relationship between linguistics and these other disciplines, we hope that it will prove particularly suitable for undergraduates following a linguistics course as part of a broadly based scheme of study. The answer must lie in the formulation of a ³middle range² notation that will do for syntax and phonology what the International Phonetic Alphabet does for phonetics.

The Foundations of Arabic Linguistics

At the same time, we can observe a profound division in the foundations of our discipline, that corresponds quite closely to the traditional philosophical opposition of idealism and materialism. The mathematical devices used to model the idealist approach to language are qualitative and algebraic, and closely modeled on the algebra of sets. Early statements about the speech community emphasized this ³structured heterogeneity² as the fundamental feature of the speech community, maintained by a uniformity of social evaluation.
