Belton, North Lincolnshire

Will Belton introduces the third angle--the glowing and hearty life-force that infuses the dark places of the book with its own relentless good nature. During these days nothing special was said between him and Clara.

Belton Estate, The

The church is of style. In the early 12th century the lands for the cell were granted by Nigel d'Albini to the of. Askerton to Clara,—did they intend to live as long as they could keep the cottage at Belton.

Amedroz felt that his breath was so completely taken away from him that he was quite unable to speak a word of answer at the moment. Her legs were like the legs of a deer; and in her whole gait and demeanour she almost gave the lie to her own name, asserting herself to have sprung from some more noble origin among the woods, than may be supposed to be the origin of the ordinary domestic cow,—a useful animal, but heavy in its appearance, and seen with more pleasure at some little distance than at close quarters. You see if I don't.

Amedroz came down into the hall, dressed for dinner, and saw his figure through the open doors. No letter was written that day, or on the next; but on the day following a formal note was sent off by Clara, in which Mr. Her cousin Will was, she thought, the more generous, the more energetic,—perhaps, by nature, the man of the higher gifts.
