The keeps an inventory of the regalia, and is responsible for their display.

Crowns and Regalia

When Charles II returned to England at the Interregnum, all the medieval Crown Jewels except the coronation spoon had been sold or melted down. The robes are of gold thread and together weigh approximately 10 kg 22 lb. Pepys recorded in his diary how Sir Robert had shown him the body of a black boy who had worked as a servant, but had died of consumption.

The single arch denotes inferiority to the monarch and shows that the prince outranks other royal children, whose coronets have no arches. It was cut from the largest gem-quality rough diamond ever found, the eponymous Cullinan, discovered in South Africa in 1905 and presented to. Ever since, the Jewels have been protected by armed guards.

Posier showed his creative genius by replacing the eight fleur-de-lis with four pairs of crossed palm branches, while the arch between them is made up of oaks leaves and acorns in small diamonds surrounding a number of large diamonds of various shapes and tints running from the front pair of crossed palms to the back pair of crossed palms, while the basketwork pattern of the two hemispheres are divided by two strips of similar oak leaves and acorns from the two side pairs of palm branches stretching up to the rows of large pearls on their borders. The priory occupied a large amount of land in Clerkenwell, and today I am exploring another part of the history of the area with a visit to the Priory Church of the Order of St John.
