Azouz Begag: 'Le Gone du Chaâba'. Étude critique

The problems of the ghetto-like environments established by and for guest workers in France after WWII, of the individual children of these ghettos who are French Citizens by dint of being born in France and even often from French parents and for whom 'breaking out' is both very difficult and statistically improbable, and Azouz Begag's own success in managing being part of the mainstream of French culture without having to forget any part of his heritage but rather by accumulating all cultural influences, are at the heart of the novel. The language and culture were predominantly a mix of Algerian Arabic, Kabyle Tamazigh and Arpitan. .
