We were suddenly aroused with the startling announcement that the enemy were approaching, and near at hand. He informed them that they had volunteered as soldiers of the United States Army to defend their country; that he wanted good soldiers - men that would stand the fire of the enemy; that our State was then being invaded by the foe, and he did not want a coward in his regiment; that if there were any cowards among them, to step out a few paces in front, and he would give them a free discharge, and they could go home. No one stepped out.

Of the nature of his scandalous behavior we know nothing, as both Tidewater Separates at the time and later Baptist historians were extremely hush-hush and fretful about the matter; but it is at least certain that Read did something more than get in a fight, which the Tidewater Separates were used to, or get drunk, which of course was considered a sin but with nowhere near the opprobrium that was attached to it after the temperance movement came into style in the nineteenth century. According to the listing of names on the Magoffin County Civil War Monument in Salyersville, a total of 431 Magoffin County men fought in the Civil War, with 308 serving for the Union and 123 for the Confederacy. Favorably though he might regard Daniel and Martha Marshall and their family, it seems that Benjamin Miller over at the Jersey Settlement never really got a chance to work with the couple or with Stearns.

In other words, then, the mainline denominational writers who look down their noses on Appalachian Christianity are, whether they know it or not, snubbing their own heritage, and the missionaries they send to Appalachia are, rather than converting benighted pagans, meeting Christians of the type many of their own ancestors used to be. White women were often involved in litigation concerning slaves through the workings of the dower laws.
