I said at the beginning that the work of the writers represented here does not necessarily have anything in common. The reader is entering a world where language is the main currency, the main treasure, the main resource. As you can already tell from these brief summaries, the works represented here do not necessarily have anything in common. The most popular literary form to emerge from this development was the tale, and the most notable practitioner was 1794—1869, author of 1830.
