Population policies in 10 countries around the world

South Africa endorses the Programme of Action and thus the strategy for development that emphasizes the reciprocal relationships between population, development and the environment. Changes in various development indicators have a direct impact on population trends. Its major programmes focus on meeting basic needs, developing human resources, democratising the state and society, and building the economy.

It will take a number of decades before the full impact of the AIDS epidemic will be felt, although the socio-economic costs of this epidemic are already quite evident. The reliance of 1,5 million households on agricultural production, together with forced removals to the homelands, has resulted in severe pressure on the land and environmental degradation.

The SDHS results indicate that immunisation coverage for children 12-23 months is moderate: 76 percent of children had been immunised against BCG, 60 percent had received three doses of DPT, 61 percent had received three doses of polio, 61 percent were vaccinated against measles, and 52 percent had had all primary immunisations. Immunisation coverage is higher for urban children than for rural children; it is higher in the Khartoum and Northern regions than in other regions; and it increases sharply with the mother's level of education.
