Later in the day, the court appointed Wang Chedo 1695—1742, who was a nephew of Wang U from the Kaesŏng lineage, as the auditor of the Military Training Administration. Returning to the question why support for birth control emerged in Korea as it did in the 1920s and 1930s, I suggest that birth control was just one technique in an arsenal called upon to mold an idealized vision of society.

“Limiting Birth”: Birth Control in Colonial Korea (1910

An advisor in this campaign was Esther Koh Ko Hwanggyŏng whose education, experience, and activities in girls' education and the social welfare of mothers in the colonial period garnered her positions in welfare work for women and children in the post-liberation period.

Presenting this ritual cup filled with wine, I sincerely desire that your spirit would accept our modest offerings. Third, the lineage produced only a few men who held a court rank or an office, and none had a meaningful career in central officialdom. And if U indeed acted as if he was displaying the mark of a true Wang, then regardless of whether or not he had any scale, his final act would have influenced the popular imagination for generations to come—as it did.
