Resulting figures could be used in public presentations, community discussions, or public grant applications. National Geographic Education's work targets two goals: Geo-Literacy: Geo-literacy is an essential skill for decision-making in 21st century personal, professional, and civic life. Becoming a More Inclusive NAEP In the 2001 geography assessment, the NAEP program used a split-sample design, so that trends in students' geography achievement could be reported across assessment years and, at the same time, the program could continue to examine the effects of including special-needs students assessed with accommodations.
