Ruskin and conservation: St Petrock's church, Parracombe

Alternative explanations for its construction suggest it may have been constructed to obtain taxes at the bridging place, or to protect and supervise mining in the area around. . Heddon Hall, the former rectory, is of Regency date, and the grandest domestic building.

An afternoon assisting with Parracombe St Petrocks Church gravesites

The bench ends are carved in high relief with a mixture of coats of arms, including a very sweet little horse rearing out of the water — the symbol of the Trevelyan family — saints and the initials of the pew owners. The objections were successful and the church was saved.

Printed copies of the county guide are also available at the church. An ancient circular earthwork, called the Castle, is near the village.

Parracombe St Petrock

There are rails round three sides of the altar, the Ten Commandments painted on a board above a pretty 15th century screen, a three tier pulpit with reading desk, box pews, and musicians' seats raised on steps at the west end. A must is a visit to St Petrock's Church.

Conservation Area

Here are just a few to wet your whistle. N Leakey and John Ruskin, as well as organisations like the SPAB and the CCT. Parracombe, for the most part a tiny collection of cottages lining a steep, narrow street, still has a post office, though it closes at 1pm each day.
