He noted that while the intellectual idea allows the various modes of extension to be related in a precise manner, there is no clear scale on which we can order our sensations of different shades of the same color, not to mention our sensations of sensible qualities of different kinds. For Malebranche, a corrective to both of these disorders of the will is to attend to clear ideas that exist in God. For instance, God acts by a general will in producing changes in bodies in accord with the law of the communication of motion.

Il rencontre un important succès là-bas. More precisely, the thesis in this section is that we see external objects by means of ideas in God. In brief prefaces added to the second volume of the Recherche, Malebranche chastised both thinkers for failing to read the work they were discussing, noting in particular that he had explicitly argued in the Recherche that the ideas we perceive exist in God rather than in us.
