Pugin

Most of his work in Ireland consisted of religious buildings.

Pugin

Most of the tiles were not glazed, as this was considered dangerous for floor surfaces. The reasons put forward to support the claim that he was a liturgist are that he had a particularly definition of liturgy; he studied liturgy for three years; he employed a particular method of writing, which was commonly used by past liturgists; many of his authorities were liturgists and historians, as well as architects and designers, and his sources related to liturgy. In 1832, Calverley Park Crescent, designed by Burton, modelled partially on those at Bath and Buxton, was constructed at Calverley.

Wellington Arch

John Nash (architect)

On the 100th anniversary of the foundation of the RAF, celebrations took place at St Clement Danes. He toured in 1846 and in 1850. This special service for children ends with the distribution of oranges and lemons to the boys and girls.

Augustus Pugin versus Decimus Burton : a Victorian architectural duel

He is commonly regarded as an architect and designer per se, but many believe he had eccentric ideas, was a fanatic for the Gothic style of architecture and that while he was religious, he had little impact on the religious controversy and events of his time.
