Spring Morning,

Of his poems some four hundred survive: these were first collected and originally edited into a corpus by his next-youngest brother, Wang Jin, by imperial command. Literally, cawing, like a crow.

28 Poems by Meng Haoran

He may also have meant to dedicate these lines to the flower of Chinese youth who fall each year in battle. Known for his youthful precocity, Wang Wei, the eldest of five brothers, set off for the imperial capital at the age of nineteen, in order to study and take the jinshi civil service entrance examination. Moon Over Miami, a film and song from 1941, is a classic example.

So if you could say the poem in Chinese, then a transliteration of the poem would help me to say those sounds. He had a rather abbreviated civil service career, passing the civil service test, beginning at the late age of 39 and ending not much later. Meng, by not passing the imperial examinations, and by not having any imperial family connections, could not qualify for a government job on his own, and thus lived a life close to poverty and want.

I tried to reach for you, but you have closed your mind. Li Bai drinking alone made friends with the moon and his shadow, Li Bai, his shadow, and the moon. The symmetrical eaves on each floor are said to resemble a yellow crane soaring in the sky and clouds, reflecting immortality and wisdom.

Spring Morning,

Alternate Translation Send As a Gift to Meng Haoran I love and respect Master Meng Whose legend is known in heaven and on earth. He remained strongly attached to this area and its scenery throughout his life.

Wang Wei (Tang dynasty)

It is also the Chinese word for Rattan, a vine we use in furniture making, but which has a night blooming flower that stinks. These poems of Meng Haoran were available in the English translations by Witter Bynner and Kiang Kanghu, by 1920, with the publication of The Jade Mountain.

It was in his role as a government official that Wang Wei was dispatched to , which was then the northwestern frontier of the Chinese empire, and the scene of constant military conflicts. He was then buried at his Lantian estate. New York: Columbia University Press.

Then, a series of promotions following this demotion was apparently attributable to a relationship with the prominent governmental minister, poet, and literary scholar Zhang Jiuling, at least until Zhang's 727 demotion to a post in Jingzhou. However, has recently argued that it was not as destructive to the Tang aristocracy as had previously been thought.
