In November of that year it established a school, the Shōwajuku Shōwa Academy, to train successors in its methods. The Shōwa Kenkyūkai was a strong proponent of, in which it envisioned that Japan would take the leading role, and its thesis influenced Konoe in his declaration of November 1938, and formed part of the theoretical basis for the.

The Origins of Nonliberal Capitalism: Germany and Japan in Comparison by Wolfgang Streeck

The author, from the Department of Politics at the University of York in the United Kingdom, discusses primitive accumulation in terms of separation, proletarianization, and its teleology. By the time the group was dissolved in 1940 it had involved, at its height, some three hundred intellectuals every year in its work.
