National and Global Perspectives

Less than half of students in Sub-Saharan Africa reach the minimum global threshold of proficiency; and very, very few students achieve advanced skills. Each mechanism is the product of local circumstances and political traditions, but certain overarching principles can be identified. Finally, she notes that the privileged people of the world, who have enjoyed the freedom to travel in the past, now have a better understanding of how most of humanity lives, i.

International Migration

China is the largest source country of foreign students in the U. While many countries have used border closures and quarantine rules as a way of controlling the spread of the virus, some world leaders are using public health as an excuse to implement restrictions on migration that they favored before the pandemic. Malawi is a notable case in point — tertiary education is almost completely subsidised by the state, yet household contribute with almost 20% of the costs in primary education.

ERIC

Few immigration systems have been built to manage migration at this scale and pace. In the majority of developing countries, net enrollment rates are higher than attendance rates.

5 things you should know about the state of the global economy

Finally, the author offers a number of recommendations for policy makers interested in developing such programs, including moving quickly to engage those who want to participate before their interest fades, providing the right amount of coordination and oversight, and building strong working relationships among key actors. The most common way to measure the private returns to education, is to study how attainment improves individual labor market outcomes — usually by attempting to measure the effect of education on wages.

ERIC

Women textile workers perform quality control tests at a factory in Izmir, Turkey. Here we show evidence of this process of education expansion using cross-country estimates of average years of schooling.

International Perspectives on Home Education

The conclusions and recommendations of the authors are not necessarily endorsed by Diversity Dynamics.

National and Global Perspectives

As usual, correlation does not imply causation — but it does show an important pattern that supports the idea that education is indeed necessary to produce social capital. The report identifies a need for both host and origin countries to implement contingency planning should migration patterns become disrupted again.
